Here, we break down the crucial aspects of filming

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Ollie is an account executive at Magenta, a recent graduate with 1st Class Honours from Bournemouth University, and PR coordinator for the LGBT in FM committee.

Introduction

In today's digital age, organisations are investing considerable amounts of money, time and effort into visual content, particularly video. So much so, in fact, that a recent study suggested that spending on video content could rise by 44% by 2021. As useful a resource this can be for engagement with consumers and fellow employees, it can be a daunting prospect to manage. Although most will enlist a professional agency to produce video content on their behalf, some situations will see PRs, journalists or even employees working together on filming projects. While some may well have experience in these fields, there is an equal chance that the majority won't. Here, we break down the crucial aspects of filming to consider – from pre-production and research through to on-set filming and post-production.

This short guide takes you through the process.

Do your research

Any good piece of media production is fundamentally constructed to achieve one thing: tell a story. Whether it is about a new invention, product or range, a profile piece with an individual who's happy to share their experiences, or an educational piece to plug a knowledge gap, the end goal is to impart wisdom and share a story. So, plan the narrative beforehand. Make sure you have invested considerable time into figuring out what you are trying to say, what you're not trying to say, and who you are trying to reach with the piece of media.

Share all information accordingly

A well-prepared shoot makes for a happy, successful and smooth-running shoot. Make sure to prepare a basic 'call sheet' that lists each scene as well as the elements you're trying to capture and reference the equipment you will need. The 'call sheet' should also include all important contact details, emergency procedures, and any additional information (such as notes surrounding location or sensitive interview topics). Share these with everyone involved at least one day before shooting. This ensures clarity, goals and purposes, and acts as a helpful 'bible' on the day. Also, crucially - secure a contributor release form. This ensures legal confirmation that all interviewees are happy to be a) involved and b) their information shared for the purposes of the video production. Templates for these can easily be found online.

On set, be assertive yet assuring

In the same way that you may not have experience on camera/set, there's every chance that those involved on the client side are in a similar boat. Luckily in the modern age of technology, we can film, reshoot, stop and start as much as necessary – so it's important to remind whoever is on the other end of the camera of this fact. People often crumble under pressure of getting things right the first time around, and it can severely disrupt the flow on-set if someone is feeling anxious or like they're causing a nuisance. Therefore, it is crucial that you as the producers assert an air of confidence, an 'everything will be fine' demeanour, with a calm and collected approach.

Stick to the schedule, as best as you can

It's all too easy to let time run away from you on set. You're working hard, you're focussed, you're (hopefully) enjoying yourself. But, and it's a big but, don't let time slip away. Make sure that you have one designated person (on a film/TV set this will normally be the role of the producer or production manager) to be actively checking time, ensuring you're on schedule. Hiccups happen, technical difficulties occur, people can be late – life happens, sure. But, where possible, try to stick as strictly to schedule, as no one wants to overrun on what will undoubtedly already be a hectic day for all involved.

5) Finally, communication is key

And this applies to pre, during and post-production. Wires can easily get crossed, messages can be misunderstood, and objectives can shift. That's simply the nature of working in film and media production. As long as everything is communicated clearly, however, there will be no major issues. Whether it be a change of location or spokesperson pre-shoot, a change of interview focus on set, or a change of edit style in post-production, ensure there is one designated person who focusses on keeping everyone in the loop.

Clearly, there is a lot more to securing a successful shoot than these five steps. Make no mistake, filming can be a high-pressured and stressful situation to be in, regardless of how well prepared you are. However, regardless of your role on set, as long as you follow these rules, are switched on, have clear objectives and communicate clearly and simply with your peers, you'll be hard-stretched to go wrong!
